Utah Power and Light Co. crews almost bit off more than they could knock down recently when they decided to tackle an old smokestack at a dormant power generating plant. The 135-foot tall smokestack on the Hale No. 1 generating plant at the mouth of Provo Canyon hasn't been used since the plant was shut down in the 1960s, said UP&L spokesman John Serfustini. Its "utility" is gone. The smokestack was built of steel plates in 1936. Company officials decided to remove the smokestack and sell the heavy steel for scrap. But the smokestack turned out to be tougher than they expected. Its base had been reinforced with extra steel and when crews using a crane attempted to pull it down, the smokestack wouldn't budge. Serfustini said workers finally used torches to cut through the steel at the smokestack's base and removed it with the crane.
